9 December 2019

The anti–extradition bill protests have continued for more than half a year, with no sign of easing. According to statistics from Hong Kong's Security Bureau, as of November 21 the number of arrests had reached 5,856. The New York Times reported that more than 200 protesters have fled to Taiwan after losing trust in Hong Kong's judicial system.

(DW Chinese) According to Hong Kong 01 and Radio Television Hong Kong, Hong Kong netizens launched a citywide "three strikes" movement early in the morning on the 9th across multiple districts. Police were deployed on alert, focusing patrols on the MTR system. So far, apart from sporadic obstructions using debris, the situation has remained largely calm.
Hong Kong's Ming Pao, citing police figures, reported that between June 9 and December 5–a period of six months–Hong Kong police fired nearly 16,000 rounds of tear gas and about 10,000 rubber bullets. Nearly 2,000 bean bag rounds and 1,900 sponge rounds were also used.

The report noted that civil rights observers criticised the scale and quantity of police use of tear gas, likening it to a military operation. Some members of the Independent Police Complaints Council also expressed surprise at the figures, but said they understood the police were outnumbered and had limited options. Nevertheless, they stated that further investigation into possible abuse was still warranted.

Hong Kong Protesters Flee to Taiwan
The New York Times reported that since the start of the anti–extradition bill movement, more than 200 young protesters have fled to Taiwan. The report said the figures were provided by lawyers, pastors, and others who assisted in these escapes.

According to the article, the fugitives feared they would not receive fair treatment in Hong Kong courts, particularly after hearing allegations of sexual assault and torture against protesters, as well as reports of injured protesters being arrested in Hong Kong hospitals. As a result, they decided to seek refuge in Taiwan.

The escape network was reportedly established secretly and spontaneously by volunteers, with various groups and individuals contributing funds and assistance to arrange for Hong Kong protesters to travel to Taiwan and to provide housing there. The report also included firsthand accounts from protesters who fled. One protester said he had taken part in the storming of the Legislative Council building, was filmed during the incident, and was recognized by two police officers the following day, prompting him to leave Hong Kong. Even now, he remains overwhelmed by stress, sadness, and pain.

On the evening of 21 July, multiple attackers assaulted people in Yuen Long. Numerous men dressed in white, armed with wooden sticks, chased and beat civilians inside Yuen Long West Rail Station, punching and kicking people at the scene. Some members of the public were beaten unconscious.

A reporter from Stand News who was reporting on-site was attacked with sticks and sustained injuries to the fingers and head. Another man was beaten until his face was covered in blood. Some victims suffered severe head wounds with heavy bleeding.

Live footage showed many people lying on the ground inside the station, including women dressed as ordinary commuters. Some members of the public were unaware of the situation, and parents continued to bring children into the station, creating extremely dangerous conditions. The men in white later chased people onto the platforms and attacked anyone they encountered.

At one point, the men in white entered train carriages and assaulted passengers inside. The train was unable to depart, and there were a large number of ordinary passengers on board at the time. Many passengers fled the train cars in panic.

According to the reporter at the scene, no police officers were present to enforce the law for over half an hour. It was not until 11:17 p.m. that approximately 10 police officers arrived, by which time the attackers dressed in white had already dispersed.

i-CABLE News
22 June 2025

[i-CABLE News] Secretary for Justice Paul Lam Ting-kwok said on a program produced by the station, Home and Nation, that the prosecution record under the Hong Kong National Security Law (NSL) over nearly five years demonstrates that prosecutions have been conducted with solid legal and evidential foundations. He criticised certain forces for smearing the NSL in an attempt to hinder Hong Kong's role in supporting national development.

The National Security Law has been in force for nearly five years, with a conviction rate exceeding 95 percent. Appearing on Home and Nation, Lam described the law's effectiveness as significant, adding that the high conviction rate reflects that the government's prosecutions are well-grounded in law and evidence.

"If out of one hundred cases, all one hundred are supported by conclusive evidence, then the conviction rate should be 100 percent. Conversely, if all one hundred cases are without evidence or legal basis, the conviction rate should be zero. When people say the conviction rate [under the National Security Law] is high, I interpret that as strong evidence that we exercise prosecutorial discretion with great caution, that prosecutions are genuinely based on reason and evidence, and that they are consistent with legal principles. That is why the courts agree with us in the vast majority of cases."

Lam said he does not agree that the National Security Law is prone to misunderstanding. He criticised what he described as unfriendly forces that deliberately smear the law in order to suppress national development.

"It is possible that some people do not fully understand a new and highly important law, or are unclear about certain aspects, or even misunderstand it. In such cases, we need patience to explain and clarify. Of course, there are also people for whom no amount of explanation will work–they are clearly intent on smearing you, attempting to 'de-internationalize' and 'de-functionalize' Hong Kong, so that we are unable to help the country's development. I believe such a strategy is obvious to all–its intentions are plain for everyone to see."

Lam added that, in addition to external explanations and rebuttals, Hong Kong could also strengthen the use of its soft power in areas such as cuisine and culture, so as to encourage other places to be more willing to engage with Hong Kong.

Last year, correctional institutions under the Correctional Services Department (CSD) admitted nearly 19,000 persons, representing a 3% year-on-year increase. The average daily prison population rose by 8% compared with the previous year, exceeding 10,000 inmates. In addition, the average daily remand population increased by 16%, reaching its highest level since 2000.

Starting this month, the CSD has organised mainland exchange tours for released individuals under supervision in hopes of strengthening their sense of national identity. Regarding whether Jimmy Lai can be released on medical parole, the department stated that Hong Kong law does not provide for medical parole, and that Lai can receive necessary medical services while in custody.

The CSD held its 2025 work review yesterday. Last year, admissions to correctional institutions increased by 3% year-on-year to 18,900 persons. The average daily prison population reached 10,315, an 8% increase. The average daily occupancy rate rose from 85% to 92%. Among nearly 30 correctional institutions, six exceeded 100% occupancy. Tung Tau Correctional Institution had the highest rate at 146%, followed by Stanley Prison at 132% and Tai Lam Centre for Women at 125%.

The average daily remand population has recorded annual increases of 15% or more since 2021. Last year it reached 4,217 persons, up 16%, marking the highest level since 2000. Commissioner of Correctional Services Wong Kwok-hing stated that due to the continued rise in remand population, the department has reallocated part of the capacity of certain institutions to accommodate remand inmates. Partial on-site redevelopment works at Lai Chi Kok Reception Centre have also commenced.

Regarding cases related to the 2019 protests and violations of the Hong Kong National Security Law and other national security-related offences, nearly 300 individuals remain in custody, while about 1,900 have been released to date. As for released persons under supervision, 1,153 were supervised last year, compared to 1,145 in 2023 and 1,093 in 2024. Since 2024, the CSD has implemented new supervision conditions requiring approval before supervised persons may leave Hong Kong. As of the end of last year, 58 applications to leave Hong Kong were received, of which 43 were approved. Approved cases involved work needs, the death of overseas family members, and handling banking matters. Applications were rejected mainly due to insufficient justification or lack of supporting documentation.

Wong Kwok-hing: No Medical Parole Under Hong Kong Law

Next Digital founder Jimmy Lai was sentenced to 20 years' imprisonment after being convicted of three charges including "conspiracy to collude with foreign or external forces."

In response to questions about whether Lai could be released on medical parole, Wong Kwok-hing said Hong Kong's current legal system does not permit medical parole. Unless prisoners are eligible for sentence reduction under the law, inmates must serve their full sentence before release; prisoners convicted under national security legislation are generally not eligible for remission.

He added that public hearings and the written judgment noted that Jimmy Lai's current health condition is stable. The correctional institution hospital is staffed by qualified medical personnel providing 24-hour services. If necessary, doctors will refer cases to specialist doctors under the Hospital Authority for follow-up. The department provides all necessary medical services to all inmates.

In cooperation with the Hospital Authority, the department has expanded telemedicine services. As of last year, psychiatric telemedicine services covered 16 public hospitals and clinics, while internal medicine telemedicine services covered seven public hospitals. The service has also expanded to orthopedics. Last year, the department arranged 1,134 telemedicine consultations for inmates, representing a 60% year-on-year increase.

Mainland Exchange Tours for Supervised Persons Starting This Month

In promoting national security education, the CSD plans to extend its in-prison "PATH program" to supervised individuals after release. Starting earlier this month, mainland exchange tours have been organised for supervised persons to familiarize them with the country's latest developments and strengthen their sense of national identity. Wong stated that participation in the exchange tours is not mandatory.

To support rehabilitation work, since October last year the CSD has established its first 3D Product Creative Design Workshop at Stanley Prison. The workshop applies a patented "food-waste-derived 3D printing composite material" technology developed by the Hong Kong Polytechnic University, converting coffee grounds into eco-friendly 3D printing materials. Operated by around 15 remand inmates, the workshop covers processes including coffee ground conversion, product design, and printing. Products made include hand-grip strength trainers and hotel supplies.

In addition, since 2020 the CSD has been replacing cell facilities in phases. New cells adopt a barred design and include anti-suicide roller fans. Large industrial floor fans have been installed in corridors to improve ventilation and heat dissipation. Various disciplined services departments have introduced innovative technologies in recent years to assist daily operations. The CSD will install the “Automatic Drone Patrol Monitoring System 2.0” in six maximum-security institutions, including Stanley Prison and Lai Chi Kok Reception Centre. The drones can patrol along preset routes.

The government will gazette the Prisons (Amendment) Rules 2025 this Friday, and the amendments will take effect immediately on the same day.

The amended rules will restrict visits that do not serve "statutory purposes." The Correctional Services Department will be empowered to apply to the court to restrict contacts between persons in custody and specific legal representatives or professional chaplains. The amendments will also abolish arrangements allowing remand prisoners to wear their own clothes and consume self-provided food.

The Security Bureau said that in light of the increasingly complex geopolitical situation and the continued presence of national security risks and hidden dangers, it is necessary to amend the Prison Rules as soon as possible in order to prevent and mitigate relevant risks at an early stage. “Every day earlier counts,” the bureau said, in effectively safeguarding national security.

According to the authorities, pursuant to the Decision of the National People’s Congress on Establishing and Improving the Legal System and Enforcement Mechanisms for the Hong Kong Special Administrative Region to Safeguard National Security and the relevant provisions of the Hong Kong National Security Law, the HKSAR has a constitutional responsibility to continuously and steadily improve its legal system and enforcement mechanisms for safeguarding national security. This is to achieve sustained and effective prevention, suppression, and punishment of acts and activities endangering national security.

The Prison Rules have been in force for many years, and it is necessary to review whether they remain fit for the needs of safeguarding national security and for contemporary correctional institution management.

A government spokesperson said that, after reviewing past law enforcement experience in handling convicted and remand prisoners, anticipated national security risks and security threats that correctional institutions may face in the future, as well as relevant laws and practices in other jurisdictions–including the United Kingdom, the United States, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and Singapore–the authorities have proposed improvements to the existing Prison Rules. The aim is to ensure effective prevention, suppression, and punishment of acts and activities endangering national security; to continuously strengthen the legal basis for correctional officers in performing their duties; to maintain prison security, order, and discipline; and to promote rehabilitation while safeguarding the lawful rights and interests of persons in custody.

The authorities have also proposed other amendment measures to enhance the enforcement effectiveness of the Correctional Services Department, and to review and revise certain provisions so that the Prison Rules are more up to date and better aligned with the operational needs of correctional institutions.

The Amendment Rules will be tabled before the Legislative Council on 23 July under the negative vetting (“first made, then scrutinised”) procedure. The government said it will fully cooperate with the Legislative Council's scrutiny, with a view to further strengthening the safeguard for national security.

Information Paper

Report to the Legislative Council on the Control and Management of the Dedicated Fund for Expenditure on Safeguarding National Security

Background

1. Safeguarding national sovereignty, security, and development interests is a constitutional responsibility of the Hong Kong Special Administrative Region (HKSAR). On 30 June 2020, the Standing Committee of the National People's Congress enacted the Law of the People's Republic of China on Safeguarding National Security in the Hong Kong Special Administrative Region (hereinafter referred to as the "Hong Kong National Security Law"), which was promulgated and implemented in Hong Kong on the same day by being listed in Annex III to the Basic Law in accordance with Article 18 of the Basic Law.

2. Pursuant to Article 12 of the Hong Kong National Security Law, the HKSAR establishes the Committee for Safeguarding National Security (hereinafter referred to as the "CSNS"), which is responsible for affairs relating to safeguarding national security in the HKSAR, assumes the primary responsibility for safeguarding national security, and is subject to the supervision of and accountability to the Central People's Government. The CSNS is assisted by a National Security Adviser designated by the Central People's Government (Article 15). The Hong Kong National Security Law also provides for the establishment of a Secretariat of the CSNS (Article 13), a department for safeguarding national security within the Police Force (hereinafter referred to as the "Police National Security Department") (Article 16), and a specialized prosecution division within the Department of Justice for national security offences (hereinafter referred to as the "National Security Prosecutions Division of the Department of Justice") (Article 18). Articles 14, 17, and 18 of the Hong Kong National Security Law clearly set out the respective duties of the CSNS, the Police National Security Department, and the National Security Prosecutions Division of the Department of Justice.

3. Pursuant to Article 19 of the Hong Kong National Security Law, with the approval of the Chief Executive, the Financial Secretary shall allocate from the general revenue of the Government a dedicated fund to meet expenditure related to safeguarding national security (hereinafter referred to as the "Dedicated Fund") and approve the establishment of posts involved, free from the restrictions of the existing laws of the HKSAR. The Financial Secretary shall submit to the Legislative Council an annual report on the control and management of the Dedicated Fund.

Control and Management of the Dedicated Fund

4. The funding arrangements for expenditure on safeguarding national security in the HKSAR have been made strictly in accordance with the relevant provisions of the

Hong Kong National Security Law. Having regard to the approved establishment of the relevant bodies and their estimates of recurrent and non-recurrent expenditure required for the discharge of duties related to safeguarding national security, the Financial Secretary allocated HK$8 billion from the Government's general revenue as the Dedicated Fund in December 2020 in accordance with the aforesaid provisions, and subsequently allocated a further HK$5 billion from the general revenue in March 2023 for meeting expenditure related to safeguarding national security.

5. Article 51 of the Hong Kong National Security Law stipulates that the funding of the Office for Safeguarding National Security of the Central People's Government in the HKSAR (hereinafter referred to as the "Office for Safeguarding National Security") shall be borne by the Central Government. Accordingly, the total allocation of HK$13 billion mentioned above does not involve any funding for the Office for Safeguarding National Security.

6. In view of the special and confidential nature of work relating to safeguarding national security, the Secretariat of the CSNS has established a dedicated accounting and finance team (hereinafter referred to as the "Finance Team") to handle income and expenditure arrangements and financial matters relating to such work, and to report directly to the Financial Secretary. The accounting policies, financial policies, and preparation of financial statements adopted by the Finance Team are consistent with the policies and practices customarily adopted by the HKSAR Government.

7. This paper sets out the report on the control and management of the Dedicated Fund for the year 2024. Expenditure from the Dedicated Fund during the reporting period is classified into two main categories:

(i) Recurrent expenditure – including salaries and allowances, fees for engagement of specialized services, rent, and other operating and administrative expenses; and
(ii) Non-recurrent expenditure – including minor building works, specialized equipment, system set-up, machinery and vehicles, and other capital expenditure.

Income during the reporting period mainly comprised interest income from deposits. During the reporting period, no additional injection of funds into the Dedicated Fund was made by the HKSAR Government.

8. To strengthen oversight of the use and management of the Dedicated Fund, the Financial Secretary arranged for an independent financial audit of the relevant accounts to ensure that the accounts and financial statements prepared by the Finance Team are accurate and proper, and comply with reasonably applicable accounting policies and standards.

9. The Financial Secretary has reviewed the financial statements for the year 2024 prepared in respect of the Dedicated Fund and audited independently, and has noted that the independent auditor agreed that the financial statements were prepared, in all material respects, in accordance with the requirements of Article 19 of the Hong Kong National Security Law, adopting and consistently applying reasonable and applicable accounting policies and standards. The independent auditor conducted the audit in accordance with Hong Kong Standards on Auditing and issued an unqualified audit opinion on the financial statements.

10. Pursuant to Article 14 of the Hong Kong National Security Law, the work of the CSNS is not subject to interference by any institution, organization, or individual in the HKSAR, and information relating to its work shall not be disclosed. Accordingly, no further disclosure will be made regarding the detailed use of the Dedicated Fund. In fact, many jurisdictions regard expenditure and staffing establishments relating to national security as highly confidential information and do not disclose detailed information on such expenditure.

Consultation

Published: 31 July 2021

As the power of the Hong Kong National Security Law continues to take effect, numerous organizations that had disrupted Hong Kong have collapsed one after another, scattering like monkeys when the tree falls. Some groups involved have hurriedly “jumped ship” to protect themselves. The Hong Kong Professional Teachers’ Union (HKPTU), long engaged in anti-China and destabilizing activities in Hong Kong, recently announced its withdrawal from organizations such as the Civil Human Rights Front and the Hong Kong Alliance, which are suspected of illegal activities and have served as major coordinating platforms for unrest.

However, such an attempt by the HKPTU to evade accountability is nothing more than a smokescreen. It neither absolves the union of its suspected legal violations nor erases its past culpability in inciting violence, fomenting disorder, and harming Hong Kong. If Hong Kong's education system is to be restored to its proper foundations and returned to the right track, the HKPTU must be thoroughly investigated and this poisonous tumour must be removed.

For a long time, the Civil Human Rights Front and the Hong Kong Alliance have acted as the vanguard for anti-China forces seeking to destabilize Hong Kong. They have openly vilified China's social system and the central government's policies toward Hong Kong, maliciously hyped and spread fallacies attacking "One Country, Two Systems," and organised a wide array of demonstrations and assemblies designed to provoke confrontation and incite unrest. They are major enemies threatening the foundations of "One Country, Two Systems," endangering national and Hong Kong SAR security, and undermining Hong Kong's prosperity and stability.

The HKPTU has had deeply entangled connections with these organizations in terms of personnel, organizational structures, finances, and interests–ties that cannot possibly be disavowed. As a trade union, the HKPTU should have focused on safeguarding teachers' legitimate rights and interests. Instead, it long ago abandoned its original mission and devolved into a full-fledged political organization. It has not only misled students and poisoned the next generation, but also collaborated with destabilizing forces to filibuster wildly in the Legislative Council. During incidents such as the "anti-national education" campaign, the illegal "Occupy Central" movement, and the "extradition bill turmoil," it fanned the flames, repeatedly inciting strikes among primary, secondary, and tertiary students and teachers. It even pushed immature young students onto the streets as "cannon fodder," fueling acts that disrupted Hong Kong.

For some time now, chaos in Hong Kong's education sector has been alarming. Politics has seeped deeply into campuses, and students have been drawn into violent unrest. The HKPTU is precisely the chief culprit behind the pollution of Hong Kong's educational environment. Under the guise of being a professional education organization, and in the name of "freedom of speech" and "academic freedom," it has allowed toxic ideologies to spread unchecked in schools, shielded so-called "poisonous teachers," supported rioters, and turned a blind eye to illegal violence. It organised the compilation of Liberal Studies teaching materials that smeared and attacked “One Country, Two Systems,” promoted books that glorified “black-clad violence,” incited unlawful behavior, and continuously “brainwashed” students. It has persistently stigmatized entirely justified national education efforts and maliciously obstructed “decolonization” education reforms, dragging Hong Kong’s education system into a mire of excessive politicization and making the overall social atmosphere increasingly violent.

Under the deterrent force of the National Security Law, the Civil Human Rights Front and the Hong Kong Alliance are now unable to protect themselves and are doomed to face justice. Hong Kong police are lawfully investigating their suspected illegal activities, and it is believed that they will inevitably face just judgment. At such a moment, the HKPTU–one of the core members of the destabilizing network–has staged a carefully choreographed act of “parting ways,” hoping to whitewash the filth accumulated over years. This is nothing but self-deception. The HKPTU’s president has recently insisted that the union’s political stance will not change, clearly demonstrating that it has no remorse for its long record of misconduct and that its withdrawal is merely a tactical move.

If teaching is lax, the teacher is to blame. The HKPTU, which styles itself as “Hong Kong’s largest professional education organization,” has colluded closely with lawless destabilizing groups, acting in concert and in disgraceful unity. This is a profound disgrace to Hong Kong’s education sector. Many students were arrested during the “extradition bill turmoil” for suspected illegal acts, and some campuses even became bases for violent activities. Students, parents, and society as a whole have paid a heavy price. “Poisonous teachers” who incited criminal behavior cannot evade responsibility, and the HKPTU, which served as their protective umbrella, bears even greater culpability. Relevant departments of the Hong Kong SAR government must thoroughly investigate the HKPTU and provide an explanation to the public.

Hong Kong’s education system has long harboured filth, poisoned students, and endangered society. The time has come to clean it up. To rectify Hong Kong education at its roots and establish a new education system compatible with “One Country, Two Systems,” the HKPTU–the greatest obstacle–must be removed in accordance with the law. Education is a matter of long-term national importance. The SAR government and all sectors of society bear inescapable responsibility. They must demonstrate resolve and courage, dare to confront problems head-on, and restore education to its core mission of nurturing people, teachers to their professional roles, and students to peaceful campuses–thereby safeguarding the future of Hong Kong and the cause of "One Country, Two Systems."

One day after Legislative Council members criticised the requirement that professional qualifications and Hong Kong SAR passports of fugitives could only be revoked six months after a court warrant is issued as being overly “compassionate,” the Secretary for Security stated that the government would “actively consider” removing the six-month condition. At the same time, the government is also considering stipulating that contracts entered into before a person is publicly designated as a fugitive would not constitute a criminal offence, thereby exempting relevant parties from facing charges carrying a maximum sentence of seven years’ imprisonment.

Responding on social media, Kevin Yam Kin-fung, who would be affected once the law comes into force and is currently residing in Australia, said that the Hong Kong government has no authority to cancel an Australian passport. This means he still has an Australian passport available and will not be affected by the cancellation of his Hong Kong passport.

Since mid-last year, Hong Kong police's National Security Department has offered bounties for the arrest of 13 overseas-based Hong Kong pro-democracy figures, including Nathan Law. At the end of last year, police also issued a wanted notice for Agnes Chow, dubbed the "Hong Kong democracy goddess," for absconding while on bail. To date, none have been apprehended. In implementing Article 23 of the Basic Law through the proposed Safeguarding National Security Ordinance, the Hong Kong government has proposed a series of restrictive measures against individuals designated by the Secretary for Security as fugitives. These measures include revoking Hong Kong SAR passports, temporarily canceling professional qualifications, business registrations, and directorships.

Among those affected, Kevin Yam–who is a lawyer–and former Legislative Council member Hui Chi-fung both hold legal qualifications. Hui obtained his Australian legal qualification last year after emigrating to Australia, while Yam is currently a Senior Research Fellow at the Georgetown Center for Asian Law in the United States.

However, questions have been raised over whether such provisions can be enforced overseas. On the fifth consecutive day of the Bills Committee meetings on the Safeguarding National Security Ordinance today (12 March), legislator Lam Kin-fung from the business sector asked whether, if fugitives are still able to obtain licenses and practice outside Hong Kong, the authorities would require relevant Hong Kong professional bodies to notify their overseas counterparts, and how the government would handle the situation.

In response, Secretary for Security Chris Tang claimed that the provisions have practical significance and could affect the recognition of overseas professional qualifications. He said that overseas institutions would be notified. If certain countries grant equivalent professional qualifications to individuals based on their Hong Kong credentials, those qualifications should logically be revoked. However, if some external forces act “shamelessly” and knowingly grant such qualifications for “political reasons” despite the individual having lost the relevant credentials, the credibility of those countries would, in his view, be seriously challenged.

At yesterday’s meeting, the committee spent considerable time discussing the provision on “designating relevant fugitives,” particularly the requirement that six months must have elapsed after a court warrant is issued before the Secretary for Security can designate someone as a fugitive. Several legislators questioned the necessity of this time limit. Committee Vice-Chairman Chan Hak-kan said that the officials were being overly “compassionate,” arguing that those who endanger national security are “worse than murderers or arsonists,” and suggested removing the six-month limit to facilitate law enforcement. Legislator Peter Douglas Koon, who is a clergyman, also said that the officials were even “more compassionate” than he is, and criticised the provision as lacking flexibility.

In response, Chris Tang stated that the provision would be reviewed. At this morning’s meeting, he said the government would “actively consider” removing the requirement that six months must have elapsed after the issuance of a court warrant before a person can be designated as a fugitive by the Secretary for Security.

This change would in turn affect another related provision, which prohibits engaging in property-related activities with fugitives, with violations punishable by up to seven years’ imprisonment. Legislators expressed concern that tenants might be innocently implicated and forced to “move out overnight.” Tang said the government would actively consider clearly stipulating that if a contract was entered into before a person was designated as a fugitive, the relevant third parties should not be regarded as having committed an offence.

Regarding the prohibition on joint ventures or partnerships with fugitives, the government will likewise consider specifying that where joint ventures or investment activities arise from contracts, agreements, or obligations entered into with third parties before a person was designated as a fugitive, those third parties would not be deemed to have acted unlawfully solely on that basis.

In addition to the 13 individuals wanted with HK$1 million bounties each and Agnes Chow, Tony Chung, former convenor of the now-dissolved student group Studentlocalism, traveled to London, the United Kingdom, on the evening of December 27 last year to seek political asylum, in violation of the one-year supervision order imposed by the Correctional Services Department following his release from prison.

24 February 2025

The trial of Jimmy Lai continued on Monday (24 February). The prosecution further cross-examined Lai over his newspaper columns, questioning whether the allegations in his writings were baseless and fear-mongering. Lai responded that what he had predicted at the time has since come true. The judge repeatedly interrupted him, warning that no political statements would be permitted. Lai was subsequently arranged to read in court 161 Apple Daily articles alleged to be seditious. Members of the public were allowed to remain in the courtroom. Proceedings will resume at noon the following day.

Lai Reiterates That His Predictions Have Come True

The prosecution continued cross-examining Lai on his Apple Daily column "Laughing at Success and Failure." It first displayed the article "Hongkongers Suffocating: Flee or Resist?", highlighting a passage stating:

"The National Security Law is a heavy blow delivered in rage after Xi could no longer tolerate dissent, accompanied by coercion, intimidation and reckoning to achieve comprehensive terror-style repression, suffocating our will to resist and stripping us of freedom and the rule of law."

The prosecution asked what "coercion" Lai was referring to. Lai said it stemmed from the implementation of the National Security Law and added that "all of this has now been realized." The prosecution questioned the basis for this claim. Lai replied that it was based on information he had heard about the law at the time. When asked what "intimidation" meant, Lai said, "Just like now–we are facing a lot of intimidation," again insisting his predictions had materialized.

The prosecution then cited another line from the article:

> "The National Security Law will not only turn Hong Kong into an ordinary mainland city without freedom or the rule of law, but may even turn it into a concentration camp shrouded in terror like Xinjiang."

The prosecution challenged the claim as groundless. Lai countered by asking, "Ask yourself–can anyone in Hong Kong today still speak the truth?" Judge Esther Toh Lye-ping immediately interrupted, saying, "That is not the prosecution's question… I will not allow any political statements." Lai responded that he was not making political statements, but the judge reminded him that the question concerned the time when the article was published, not the present. Lai replied, "OK."

Pressed again on whether the claim was unfounded, Lai agreed, saying, "You can say that." Asked whether it was merely his personal feeling, Lai replied, "It was based on what I heard at the time, and it has now all come true." Judge Toh interrupted again: "There you go again–this is not answering the question… the court will give no weight to this." Lai responded "OK," and under further questioning said he was making predictions at the time, denying that he intended to instill fear or incite opposition to the government.

Prosecution Says Lai "Does Not Care About the Truth"

The prosecution next questioned a passage in which Lai wrote that "powerful elites are selling assets and moving money overseas," asking whether Lai was projecting his own feelings. Lai said he was referring to major conglomerates that publicly supported the National Security Law while secretly withdrawing capital, and that the government's use of such support as proof of stability and prosperity was "wrong and shameless." He agreed that he was describing the Chinese Communist Party as "shameless and untrustworthy," but denied that he intended to undermine public trust in the authorities, saying, "This was my feeling–I write from the heart."

When asked why he wrote that then Secretary for Justice Teresa Cheng had lied by insisting the law had no retrospective effect, Lai said he could not recall the reason. He agreed that at the time he did not yet know the final contents of the law and had no basis to say it was retrospective. However, he denied allegations that his writing incited hatred against the Chinese Communist Party or the Hong Kong government, or deepened hostility among different social groups, saying he was merely portraying the pessimistic outlook he felt at the time.

The prosecution then displayed another post-NSL column, "Fly On–The Backbone of Conscience Is Holding Us Up," which included the line:

> "Some people said to me: leave quickly–collusion with foreign forces is treason and can get you shot."

The prosecution pointed out that Lai had already read the law and would have known the offence carried no death penalty. Lai replied, "I did not say the law said that; I said someone said that to me." When challenged again, Lai added, "He may have meant that I would be sent to the mainland."

The prosecution repeatedly accused Lai of spreading false information and said, "Mr Lai, you do not care about the truth." Lai denied this, reiterating that he was quoting others. Asked why he did not clarify in the article that the claim was untrue, Lai agreed that it would have been better to do so.

Prosecution Rebuts Claim That Hong Kong Has Lost Its Status

In another article, "From Desolation to Prosperity, Then Falling Off a Feudal Cliff," Lai wrote that remarks by a senior official suggested further "tightening" laws might follow, potentially leading to electronic surveillance and mass detention camps like Xinjiang. The prosecution said this was pure speculation without basis. Lai replied that it followed his logic–if the law could be tightened further, anything could happen.

The same article claimed the law destroyed the rule of law and that corruption would become rampant. The prosecution noted that the law had been in force for less than two weeks when the article was published. Lai again insisted his predictions had since been realized. When he asked rhetorically, "Where is our international financial centre now? It's gone," the prosecution responded that Hong Kong remains an international financial centre.

Judge Toh intervened, instructing Lai to answer questions and not argue with the prosecution, warning again against political statements. When Lai asked whether he could explain, the judge firmly replied, "No!" The exchange became heated, with Lai saying that without explanation his answers would be incomplete, and the judge repeating that he must simply answer the questions.

The prosecution argued that Lai was constructing a narrative based on his own views to incite fear, manipulate public sentiment against the central and Hong Kong governments, and stir dissatisfaction. Lai disagreed. Judge Alex Lee Wan-tang observed that if someone honestly believes a perception, it may not be fabrication. The prosecution responded that Lai was fabricating based on speculation.

Lai Says He Changed His Conduct After the Law Took Effect

In another article, "Time Is a Weapon," one passage states: "I do not believe that businesspeople would remain attached to this place once the protection of the rule of law is gone, nor do I believe that Hong Kong's status as an international financial centre can be maintained… I also do not believe that, in the end, the Chinese Communist Party will refrain from arresting people and sealing off ports, further intensifying repression. That, however, would likely happen one or two years later. I hope that by then Xi Jinping will have lost power, the CCP will return to the path of openness, and we will have a chance to breathe." The prosecution said Lai had no basis to claim Hong Kong had lost the rule of law. Lai replied that the National Security Law had overridden other laws. The prosecution countered that the law only takes precedence in cases of conflict, not wholesale replacement. Lai said this amounted to the same thing.

Asked whether he hoped sanctions would continue, Lai denied it, saying he only called for sanctions before the law came into effect and changed his conduct afterwards to avoid breaking the law.

During exchanges over the prosecution's questioning, Lai repeatedly challenged the basis of the allegations. Judge Susana Maria D'Almada Remedios reminded him that it was the prosecution's duty to present its case and evidence, while the ultimate determination rested with the court. When Lai questioned whether allegations could be made without basis, Judge Lee said Lai could simply answer "disagree." Lai later accused the prosecution of repeating questions. Judge Remedios instructed him to answer only "agree" or "disagree." Lai remained silent despite repeated prompts, leading to a prolonged pause before he finally acknowledged that he understood.

The case was adjourned to Tuesday (25 February). Lai will continue reading in court the 161 Apple Daily articles alleged to be seditious on Monday afternoon and Tuesday morning, with the public allowed to remain present.

Media tycoon Jimmy Lai, founder of Next Digital, together with three Apple Daily–related companies, was found guilty after a 156-day trial by three judges designated under the Hong Kong National Security Law of charges including "conspiracy to collude with foreign forces" and "conspiracy to publish seditious publications." Lai, along with his co-defendants–including six senior Apple Daily executives and two members of the "Stand with Hong Kong (SWHK)" team, Andy Li and Chan Tsz-wah–appeared on Monday (12 January) at the West Kowloon Magistrates' Courts (sitting as the High Court) for mitigation submissions.

Represented by Senior Counsel Robert Pang, the defence emphasized that Lai is now 78 years old and suffers from various medical conditions including eye disease, hypertension, and diabetes. During remand, his weight reportedly dropped sharply. Although not life-threatening, the defence said that life under solitary confinement has been "burdensome," stating plainly that "every day he remains in prison, he moves closer to the end of his life." The defence also questioned the accuracy of a Correctional Services Department (CSD) report that claimed Lai's weight had increased by six kilograms over four years, suggesting the data was erroneous.

The defence did not mention in court whether Lai had submitted any mitigation letter. Media later confirmed outside the courtroom, through Lai's legal team, that Lai himself and his relatives had not submitted any mitigation letters.

Nine defendants were brought to court that morning and seated in three rows in the dock, guarded by 20 correctional officers. Wearing a white jacket and a light green sweater, Lai sat in the centre of the front row. He wore thick-framed glasses and headphones, appeared in good spirits, smiled, and nodded and waved toward the public gallery. During a recess, when a spectator made a blowing-a-kiss gesture toward him, Lai smiled broadly and briefly returned the gesture.

As for the other defendants, the six Apple Daily editorial and management executives were seated at different positions in the dock. Former CEO Cheung Kim-hung wore a blue padded jacket; former deputy publisher Chan Pui-man wore a light blue jacket with a beige turtleneck; former editor-in-chief Law Wai-kwong wore a dark blue suit jacket and appeared relaxed; former executive editor Lam Man-chung wore a khaki jacket; English edition executive editor Fung Wai-kwong wore a blue suit jacket and white shirt and frequently looked toward the public gallery; former columnist Yeung Ching-kee wore a black trench coat.

Judges Question Whether Lai Received Preferential Treatment in Prison

Representing the prosecution, Deputy Director of Public Prosecutions Anthony Chau Tin-hang cited CSD medical reports stating that Lai's overall health condition was "unremarkable," stable throughout, and that his psychological condition was normal. Although Lai had previously complained of tooth pain and a toenail infection, the tooth issue was resolved after extraction without further complaints, while Lai declined treatment for the toenail condition, which monitoring showed had not worsened. The prosecution also noted that Lai experienced palpitations around mid-last year but raised no further complaints after seeking medical attention.

The prosecution emphasized that while the defence claimed Lai had lost 10 kilograms in prison, the latest CSD report showed that his current weight was only 0.8 kilograms less than when he was first remanded in early December 2020, and that by Asian adult standards he was considered obese. However, by visual observation in court, Lai appeared significantly thinner than before his arrest.

The prosecution further explained that Lai was placed in solitary confinement, citing CSD reports that at the initial stage of remand Lai had submitted a written request for such arrangements to ensure his personal safety, given the high profile of his case and concerns about harassment by other inmates. The prosecution stressed that the arrangement was not solely for security reasons but also based on Lai's own request, and that the order was reviewed and confirmed monthly without any complaints or requests from Lai.

During his detention, Lai has consistently been allowed visits from family members and clergy, provided with recreational items and outdoor activity time, and has never complained about prison medical services. One judge questioned whether Lai's treatment might have been more favorable than that of other inmates; the prosecution responded that such determinations depend on individual circumstances.

Defence: Each Day in Prison Brings Lai Closer to the End of His Life

In mitigation, Senior Counsel Pang cited medical reports stating that Lai suffers from hypertension, diabetes, retinal vein occlusion, as well as heart, nail, and muscle inflammation issues. While not immediately life-threatening, the defence argued that these conditions, combined with Lai's advanced age and solitary confinement, made prison life "burdensome." Pang remarked that, as seen in court, compared with the period before remand, Lai could no longer be described as "Fatty Lai," given his sharp weight loss in custody.

When the defence raised Lai's eye condition, Judge Esther Toh Lye-ping commented that "many elderly people have that." Judge Alex Lee Wan-tang responded to the issue of weight loss by saying it "could be a good thing or a bad thing–some people would very much like to lose weight."

The defence later cited data indicating that between June 2023 and April 2024, Lai's weight dropped abnormally from 86 kilograms to 75 kilograms, and that his hypertension had worsened. The defence suggested that there may have been clerical errors in the CSD reports, as Lai's weight at the beginning of remand exceeded 80 kilograms. The prosecution confirmed with the CSD that the data was accurate and supported by documentary evidence. The defence said it would further verify the records and expressed confidence that the court would understand its concerns. Judge Toh remarked that she had "no doubts," adding that even sitting at home during holidays could lead to weight gain. The defence replied that being on holiday is different from being in prison, to which Judge Toh clarified that she was referring to prolonged sitting leading to weight gain.

Judge Lee pressed the defence on how Lai's condition should affect sentencing. The defence reiterated that, compared with inmates aged 20 or 40, imprisonment would inevitably have a greater impact on Lai, stating bluntly: "Every day he spent in prison will bring him that much closer to the end of his life."

Regarding solitary confinement, the defence said Lai claimed he was asked to sign documents without reading their contents, though it acknowledged this would not persuade the court. The defence stressed that regardless of whether the arrangement was voluntary, solitary confinement constituted an additional hardship for Lai. The court questioned whether it was Lai's own choice, just like when "your wife asks you to choose between a single or double hotel room." Judge Lee agreed that solitary confinement could hinder social interaction and cause distress, but said it did not amount to additional punishment, as Lai could request to terminate the arrangement at any time. The defence responded that due to special circumstances, Lai had no real choice but to accept the arrangement, making his prison life harsher than that of other inmates.

[Ming Pao Exclusive] On the third day after legislation under Article 23 of the Basic Law came into effect, its first enforcement case emerged. The new Article 23 regime tightens the threshold for early release of prisoners convicted of national security offences, requiring proof that their release would not be detrimental to national security before any sentence reduction may be granted.

Ma Chun-man, known as the “Second-Generation Captain America,” was sentenced to five years’ imprisonment for offences under the Hong Kong National Security Law. It is understood that under the previous system of sentence remission, he could have been released as early as yesterday. However, due to the new requirements, he was not granted any sentence reduction.

Regarding the fact that, just three days after the law came into force, sentence remission was denied to a national security prisoner, Senior Counsel Ronny Tong said it is difficult to say whether the decision was overly hasty. He noted that if a prisoner can demonstrate that the Correctional Services Department failed to provide a reasonable and sufficient opportunity to make representations, there may be grounds to apply for judicial review.

Translation of the Material:
The following is the transcript of remarks made by the Chief Executive, Mr John Lee, before this morning's Executive Council meeting today (4 July):

Chief Executive: Good morning. Yesterday, the Police announced that the National Security Department had obtained court approval to issue arrest warrants against eight persons who had fled overseas, suspected to have committed offences under the Hong Kong National Security Law, and put them on the wanted list. This police action is the proper and effective discharge of their duty to safeguard national security, and I fully support and endorse it.

The Police attach great importance to these cases and have offered a reward of HK$1 million for each wanted person, calling on members of the public to provide information about the wanted persons or related cases. Any member of the public who provides information in accordance with the reward notice may receive the reward in full or in proportion, depending on the outcome. I must emphasise that endangering national security is a serious offence, and the SAR Government will enforce our law strictly.

In pursuing perpetrators who endanger national security, the Government will use every lawful means, spare no effort, and pursue them to the end – holding them to lifelong legal liability. No matter where they flee to, however far, we will pursue these criminals for life.

Any member of the public may assist the Police in arresting these wanted persons, and the Police will handle this in confidence. Those who provide leads may, in accordance with the reward notice, receive the reward based on the actual outcome – this includes the relatives and friends of the wanted persons, who are all eligible, and we welcome them to provide information about the wanted persons.

The only way for a wanted person to end their status as a fugitive is to surrender. Surrendering may also allow the courts to consider a reduced sentence under the Hong Kong National Security Law. Otherwise, they will remain wanted for life, living in fear every day, in dread of arrest.

Separately, I would like to announce that tomorrow I will lead a delegation of the SAR Government to Guiyang, Guizhou Province, for three days, to attend the 2023 Pan-Pearl River Delta Regional Joint Conference of Chief Executives... [regional co-operation policy content follows, concerning the "9+2" framework covering nine Mainland provinces and the two SARs, CEPA arrangements, and Hong Kong's role in regional economic development].

This year's forum, themed “Forging ahead in a new era, breaking new ground through co-operation,” will deepen Pan-Pearl River Delta regional co-operation... [further policy content regarding national development strategy].

Thirdly, I have been in touch with the President of the Legislative Council, and next Thursday, July 13, I will attend the second “Chief Executive's Question and Answer Session” at the Legislative Council. The Government will shortly write to the Legislative Council proposing topics on which the Chief Executive wishes to consult members. I welcome members to offer their views on these topics, and they may also raise questions on any other topic. Thank you.

Reporter: Good morning, Chief Executive. The Police have offered a reward of HK$1 million each to hunt down eight wanted persons. Among them, Nathan Law has said he will not return to surrender, and Fung-yee (Anna) Kwok has said the SAR Government has no authority to make arrests overseas, suggesting that the wanted notices are merely intended to instill fear – does this reflect that the reward scheme is unlikely to be effective? Ronny Tong has also pointed out that, under UN guidelines, political offenders or persons with political backgrounds may not be extradited – how likely is it that they can successfully be arrested? Second question, regarding talent admission, is there a plan to relax the "Top Talent Pass Scheme" requirement of graduating from a top-100 university? How will their academic qualifications be verified in future? The Government plans to admit 35,000 talents per year, but has already approved 49,000 this year – why is there still a plan to relax the requirement further? Thank you.

Chief Executive: The Police attach great importance to these eight wanted fugitives, and offering a reward is a method the Police use when apprehending suspects of serious offences. Apart from these eight reward notices, in fact, the Police have historically offered rewards for the pursuit of criminals who have committed serious offences, such as murder and armed robbery, and there are still over a dozen rewards currently in effect. This police action demonstrates, first, that we will spare no effort and use every possible means to pursue perpetrators who endanger national security – as I have said, we will enforce our law strictly and use every possibility available. Second, whatever methods the Police use to arrest these criminals, they will act according to the actual circumstances. We have different forms of police co-operation with different jurisdictions, and I firmly believe that in pursuing these suspects for life, there will certainly be opportunities and means to do so, and they will not be allowed to escape. Third, we want society to understand that those alleged to have violated the Hong Kong National Security Law have committed very serious offences, and we will pursue them to the end, using every possible means. I believe this reward scheme will encourage many law-abiding citizens, as well as members of the public who believe in doing their utmost to safeguard national security, to willingly provide any information. So I support and endorse this reward scheme. I also believe that in pursuing these wanted persons for life, we will have the opportunity and means to apprehend them, and I urge them to surrender as soon as possible.

Separately, regarding the overall talent admission policy... [talent policy response follows, addressing global competition for talent, the “Eight Centres” positioning strategy, and the need for diverse expertise across technology, cultural industries, arts, and intellectual property].

Reporter: Chief Executive, good morning. First, I would like to ask about the eight wanted persons under the National Security Department. Unlike murder suspects, these eight persons have responded online since the Police announcement yesterday, and some are active daily on social media, updating on their whereabouts and recent situations. How do you view this group of wanted persons responding so actively to the SAR Government from a distance – do you find it provocative or challenging? How much practical effect can this reward-based manhunt achieve? Ronny Tong has also mentioned that persons with political backgrounds may not be extraditable – even if they travel to jurisdictions with which we have judicial co-operation, would it still be impossible to arrest them? So what use is the reward scheme? What would be its greatest effect? Thank you.

Chief Executive: We will continue to monitor the conduct of the wanted persons. Any unlawful act will become evidence against them upon arrest, for the purposes of prosecution. This further reflects that we must spare no effort and go all out to pursue these perpetrators who endanger national security; we need to demonstrate that we will strictly crack down on and deter any conduct or activity that endangers national security. Moreover, this also represents the SAR Government’s determination to spare no effort and go all out in discharging this important responsibility. This action sends a clear message: we will not tolerate this, and we will seek the assistance of different members of the public in arresting these persons – the reward is intended to provide everyone who wishes to help apprehend them with a better and more convenient means of contact.

I firmly believe that as we pursue these fugitives for life, there will always be an opportunity to apprehend them, and I have confidence in the Police's capability and tenacity in this regard. Whatever the outcome, they will be pursued for life, and will live in fear for the rest of their lives, dreading arrest and being brought before the courts at any moment.

Furthermore, given that these individuals who endanger national security are capable of carrying out such acts, we will also investigate the forces and power behind them. The forces behind them may of course not stop, but I must also tell them: our forces in pursuing and combating them will not stop either. Thank you.

They are welcome to provide information about the wanted persons.

For the wanted persons to end their life on the wanted list, there is only one way: surrender.

By surrendering, they may also, under Hong Kong's National Security Law, receive the court's consideration for a reduced sentence.

Otherwise, they will be wanted for life, worrying every day about being arrested and living in fear.

The following is the full transcript of remarks made by the Secretary for Security, Mr Chris Tang, to the media today (July 4) after attending a meeting of the Legislative Council Panel on Security:

Secretary for Security: Fellow Hong Kong citizens, members of the press, regarding the Police National Security Department’s lawful issuance of arrest warrants against eight persons who have violated the Hong Kong National Security Law and absconded overseas, I have a few points to add.

Firstly, these persons believe that having “run off” overseas, they may act with impunity and continue to engage in conduct endangering national security, including some of them proposing sanctions against Hong Kong judges and proposing to undermine Hong Kong's status as an international financial centre. These attempts to endanger the rule of law in Hong Kong and to undermine Hong Kong’s status as an international financial centre must be severely punished, must be pursued in accordance with our law, and the public of Hong Kong must be told of these evil acts endangering Hong Kong and the nation.

This time, in addition to putting these persons on the wanted list, we must also cut off their funding chain, including freezing, restricting, confiscating and forfeiting their assets. In addition, we must also identify their contacts, associates, and the financiers behind them in Hong Kong or overseas. Any person who assists, abets, or provides financial assistance to these persons to continue engaging in conduct endangering the security of Hong Kong or national security may break the law. Furthermore, if a person knowingly conducts online crowdfunding to continue raising funds for these persons despite knowing that they endanger national security, that person may also be breaking the law.

In addition, we have offered a reward of HK$1 million in respect of each wanted person. Our purpose is to enable persons in Hong Kong or overseas, or persons connected in any way with these individuals, to come forward with information, so that if it enables us to apprehend these wanted persons and bring them to a satisfactory prosecution, the informant may receive the reward in full or in proportion.

Furthermore, this announcement also serves as a final opportunity for the fugitives. Under Article 33 of the Hong Kong National Security Law, if these persons surrender themselves, they may have the opportunity to receive a lighter sentence, including through voluntary surrender, providing an account of their own offences, or exposing the offences of others – all of which may qualify for lenient treatment under Article 33 of the Hong Kong National Security Law.

I also want to tell the people of Hong Kong: you must recognise the true face of these wanted fugitives – they wish to endanger Hong Kong and national security. Do not, under any circumstances, be incited by them, and do not assist, abet, or provide financial assistance to these persons, because in doing so you may be breaking the law.

Separately, I have noted news reports concerning the "modern-day traitor of the Chinese nation," Nathan Law. He has shamelessly responded, claiming that what he is doing is reasonable and justified, and has even called on us to make public the evidence, while at the same time refusing to return to Hong Kong. If he believes his conduct is reasonable, lawful, and justified, I invite him to return to Hong Kong. At that time, we will present all our evidence in court, before the people of Hong Kong. This kind of conduct – like a tortoise withdrawing into its shell, profiting from others' suffering – while you enjoy prosperity and glory abroad, the young people in Hong Kong whom you incited must bear the legal sanctions and consequences. I hope you will reflect – I hope you will find your courage, find your human dignity, and find your conscience, and return to Hong Kong to surrender. Finally, I wish to say to all these wanted persons: the law enforcement authorities of Hong Kong will devote their whole lives to bringing you back for arrest. Today, you may still have some use value, and there may still be some protective umbrella from foreign powers shielding you – but the day you no longer have any use value, you will become a discarded pawn. Thank you.

Reporter: Are there any more proactive methods of pursuing these eight persons, apart from the reward? For example, seeking the assistance of Interpol, or local Chinese or overseas Chinese community organisations? Given the practical difficulty of this operation, is this reward scheme more a gesture than a substantive measure?

Secretary for Security: Everything we do is substantive action – we are using every feasible means to bring these wanted persons to justice. In many serious offences, we offer rewards. The conduct of these eight persons all contravenes the Hong Kong National Security Law and is very serious, carrying a maximum penalty of life imprisonment. The reward scheme is therefore one of the methods, in the hope that members of society can provide further evidence of their crimes, or report to us any information regarding their movements or circumstances, so that we may be able to effect an arrest.

Reporter: Ronny Tong has said that persons with political backgrounds cannot be extradited. Even if there are reports, apart from the reward, does the SAR Government simply have to wait for them to surrender? Is there anything else that can be done? Also, the eight persons have made clear that they will not surrender and will not stop their advocacy overseas – what is the purpose of this high-profile wanted-with-reward approach?

Secretary for Security: I think the purpose of the reward is to obtain information regarding these persons, so that in future we can arrest them, or even bring them to a satisfactory prosecution. We have a great deal of work underway, including, as I mentioned, identifying who their financiers are and who they are in contact with – through identifying these persons, we may be able to obtain further evidence. As for what Ronny Tong mentioned, I would say that Hong Kong is purely evidence-based; whether or not you have broken the law has nothing to do with your personal background when it comes to arrest or targeted action. It is only when you have criminal intent and engage in criminal conduct, whatever law you have violated, including the Hong Kong National Security Law, that we will, based on the evidence, take action to investigate you, or even arrest or place you on the wanted list. I also wish to say: no one is above the law by virtue of any particular background.

Reporter: Secretary, this morning the Chief Executive mentioned welcoming the relatives and friends of the eight persons to provide information in exchange for the reward. In fact, many of the eight persons have relatives and friends in Hong Kong – for example, Yuan Gong-yi (Elmer Yuen)'s family members, Yuen Mi-ming and Yuen Mi-chang, who are in Hong Kong, or associates from the Hong Kong Confederation of Trade Unions. Will you question them and ask them to provide information? Secondly, the Government has updated the legislative agenda but Article 23 legislation is not included – does this mean it will be difficult to complete Article 23 legislation this year? What considerations lie behind this?

Secretary for Security: Firstly, as I have said, we will devote the full effort of all disciplined services' law enforcement officers to conducting investigations in relation to these eight serious offenders, with the hope of arresting them. As for who we will meet, who we will question, and what we will ask, I think this concerns operational matters, so it would not be convenient for me to disclose this here.

As for the legislation under Article 23 of the Basic Law, we are striving to complete the legislation this year, and at the latest next year. At this moment it has not yet been put on the agenda; if we are able to meet the timeline, it can be added to the Legislative Council's agenda at any time.

These people think that because they have fled, and gone overseas, they can act recklessly and continue to do things that endanger national security.

They must be severely punished and held accountable under the law.

We must also tell Hong Kong citizens about these acts that harm Hong Kong and endanger our country.

In addition, for each of these wanted persons, we have offered a reward of HK$1 million.

Our purpose is to hope that people, whether in Hong Kong or overseas, or anyone connected to these people, can provide intelligence.

If this enables us to bring these wanted persons to justice, and also enables them to face a successful prosecution, they may receive, or receive on a proportional basis, these reward payments.

In addition, this announcement also serves as a final opportunity for these wanted fugitives.

Under Article 33 of the National Security Law, if these people turn themselves in, there is a chance they may receive a lighter punishment.

Finally, I want to say to all these wanted persons: Hong Kong's law enforcement agencies will devote all our efforts throughout our lives to arresting you and bringing you back.

Today, you may still have some use value to them, so foreign forces may still be protecting you.

But one day, when you no longer have any value, you will become a discarded pawn.

Translation of the Material:

The following is the transcript of remarks made by the Chief Executive, Mr John Lee, before this morning's Executive Council meeting today (July 11):

Chief Executive: Good morning, everyone. This Thursday, that is two days from now, I will attend the Legislative Council for the second “Chief Executive's Question and Answer Session.”

[The Chief Executive opened with remarks concerning the second “Chief Executive's Question and Answer Session” with the Legislative Council, including proposed consultation topics arising from the 20th National Congress Report (cultural and arts industries, legal talent, and emergency response and public safety); the Executive Council’s upcoming recess and preparation of the second Policy Address; and an upcoming trade delegation to Singapore, Indonesia, and Malaysia. This content is unrelated to the matters in issue in this report and is omitted accordingly.]

Reporter: Hello. I would like to ask about the ground subsidence at the Man Kam To boundary crossing yesterday – has the SAR Government made enquiries with the Mainland as to the cause of the incident? Was it related to a lack of inspection over an extended period, or some other cause? When is the subsidence expected to be repaired? Also, I would like to ask about the progress of the National Security Department's pursuit of the eight wanted Hong Kong persons overseas – is there any new intelligence? If there continues to be none, will the Government continue to wait? Would you consider raising the reward amount or seeking international assistance? Also, the Chief Executive just mentioned preparing the Policy Address in October and consulting the community – which sectors will be consulted first, and what will be the focus? Thank you.

Chief Executive: Thank you. First, regarding the ground subsidence at the Man Kam To boundary crossing, which has caused some unevenness on the ground surface, we are very concerned about this. The Secretary for Transport and Logistics has already explained that our food supply from Mainland China will not be affected. Although northbound traffic through Man Kam To has been affected, many vehicles can pass through other crossings, including the Liantang/Heung Yuen Wai boundary crossing, to travel north. Of course, we hope to repair the Man Kam To crossing as soon as possible, as cross-boundary clearance is very important to our overall trade. We have communicated with the relevant Mainland Chinese authorities, who are actively addressing the actual situation. I hope this can be resolved as soon as possible, but according to preliminary information, it may take about a month, or longer — measured in months. We will maintain communication with them and will inform the public, particularly the trade sector, as soon as information becomes available.

Secondly, regarding the eight wanted fugitives who have violated the Hong Kong National Security Law and endangered national security through serious offences, we have offered a bounty to pursue them. I have said many times that this pursuit will be lifelong, and we will use every possible means to pursue them, including holding accountable any person who provides them with financial assistance or other forms of assistance; we will also pursue those providing backing behind them, or even those who may be controlling them. New information will continue to emerge during the investigation, and we must ensure that the investigation makes progress, so we will not disclose investigation details at this stage – but the intensity of the investigation will only increase, and we will also broaden our intelligence-gathering and striking network. Everyone must therefore understand the serious offences committed by these eight wanted persons. As I have said, everyone should also regard them as “rats crossing the street,” to be shunned. Anyone with information should provide it to the Police, and may accordingly receive the reward we have offered – anyone who helps the Police effect an arrest or a successful prosecution will receive the reward based on the actual outcome. At present, the Police have already received some information and will continue to develop intelligence in this regard, relentlessly combating them, and will strictly enforce our law.

[The Chief Executive's response continued with remarks on the Policy Address consultation process, followed by responses to media questions on unrelated domestic matters – namely, the decline in the school-age population and its relationship to emigration, government measures on population policy and the birth rate, and mandatory building inspection and subsidy schemes for ageing buildings. This content is unrelated to the matters in issue in this report and is omitted accordingly.]

First, concerning the eight wanted persons who violated the Hong Kong National Security Law and endangered national security, the eight wanted persons involved in serious offences, we have offered rewards for their pursuit and arrest.

As I have said many times regarding this pursuit operation, it will be a lifelong pursuit.

We will also use every means available to pursue them.

This includes any financial assistance provided to them, as well as assistance provided by other means; we will pursue accountability for all such matters.

We will further pursue those forces behind them which support them, and even those forces which may control them.

In the course of the investigation, new information will continue to emerge.

We must ensure that our investigation makes progress.

Therefore, as to the details of the investigation, we will not disclose them at this stage.

However, the intensity of the investigation will only increase.

We will also continue to expand our intelligence-gathering network, as well as our network for combating them.

Therefore, everyone must indeed understand the serious offences committed by these eight wanted persons.

As I have said, everyone should also regard them as “rats crossing the street,” to be shunned.

Those who have intelligence should provide it to the police.

They may also thereby receive the rewards we have offered.

Anyone who assists the police in making arrests or securing successful prosecutions may, depending on the actual circumstances, receive these rewards.

At present, the police have also received some information.

They will continue to develop intelligence collection in certain areas, combat them relentlessly, and strictly enforce the law.

The following is the full transcript of remarks made by the Secretary for Security, Mr Chris Tang, at Hong Kong International Airport today (August 27) before his departure for Vietnam:

Secretary for Security: Fellow Hong Kong citizens, members of the press, over the next five days I will visit Vietnam and Singapore, spending two days in Vietnam and three days in Singapore.

[The Secretary for Security described the itinerary and purpose of his visits: in Vietnam, accompanied by the Director of Immigration, he would meet with the Ministry of Public Security and related agencies to discuss co-operation on crime prevention, immigration matters, and public security, including the signing of a memorandum of understanding on combating illegal immigration; in Singapore, he would visit INTERPOL's Global Complex for Innovation and the Ministry of Home Affairs and related law enforcement agencies to discuss crime prevention, cybersecurity, immigration, public security, and correctional facilities, and would also meet with Hong Kong residents studying, working, or doing business in both countries.]

Reporter: Has the Police National Security Department made any plans to arrest Jens Galschiot over the “Pillar of Shame”? Has there been any action or exchange with the Danish Ministry of Foreign Affairs on this matter? It has previously been mentioned that artistic creation is a common tactic used to endanger national security – it has been noted that a mural depicting a worker in a yellow hard hat recently appeared at a fast-food restaurant in Sheung Wan; could you comment on what elements of this mural violate national security? Did the Home and Youth Affairs Bureau consult the Police beforehand?

Secretary for Security: As to your first question, I think that whether or not we take arrest action in respect of any person depends on the facts, the evidence, and the relevant law. It would not be appropriate for me to comment on individual cases here, but I want to tell everyone: if someone, including a thief, writes to me asking whether he is wanted and whether he would be arrested if he came to Hong Kong, I will not answer, because I will not tell a thief that I will arrest them. But in certain circumstances, we do disclose wanted persons to the public – for example, in relation to the eight persons wanted for violating national security, including Hui Chi-fung and Nathan Law. What is the purpose of this? First, we hope that members of the public can provide us with further information, and we offer a reward. Secondly, we must also tell the people of Hong Kong that these persons are wanted under the National Security Law, and that people must under no circumstances contact them and must guard against them. Furthermore, I must also tell the people of Hong Kong that if they assist these wanted persons, they may be in violation of the relevant Hong Kong legislation.

As for the mural incident just raised by the reporter, I believe the Secretary for Home and Youth Affairs, Ms Alice Mak, has already explained the situation – members of the public expressed concern, the Government conveyed these concerns to the wall's management, and with the management's consent, the relevant government department removed the mural. I think this has already been made very clear.

Reporter: The "Pillar of Shame" has now been seized as evidence – how will the authorities dispose of it once the case concludes? Jens Galschiot has expressed hope that the authorities will return it to him – will it be returned?

Secretary for Security: The exhibit you mentioned is connected to some of our cases, and its handling will follow the same procedures as all exhibits we deal with – first, we must wait for the case to conclude, and once concluded, we will deal with the relevant exhibits in accordance with the applicable regulations.

Reporter: The United States has said that the Police National Security Department has harassed the family members of the eight wanted persons – what is your view of the US response?

Secretary for Security: With regard to the relevant statement by the US Government, this is an attempt to demonise the actions taken by our Hong Kong law enforcement authorities in safeguarding national security, and I must condemn it here. Safeguarding national security is something that any civilised society would do – the United States itself has more than 20 pieces of relevant legislation, so why is it that they may safeguard national security, yet when Hong Kong law enforcement authorities safeguard national security, they criticise us? The people of Hong Kong enjoy their freedoms – including freedom of speech, procession, and assembly – protected under the law, including the Basic Law and the Hong Kong National Security Law. There is absolutely no issue here.

Translation of the Material:
The following is the full transcript of remarks made by the Secretary for Security, Mr Chris Tang, to the media this afternoon (December 15) after attending an event in Causeway Bay:

Secretary for Security: Fellow Hong Kong citizens, members of the press. First, I would like to add some remarks regarding the Police's further wanting of five fugitives yesterday (December 14). First, during their time at large, these five "runaway" fugitives have continued to engage in conduct endangering national security. Such conduct includes begging foreign governments to impose "sanctions" against central and SAR officials, and even judicial officers. In addition, they have published videos suspected of inciting secession, inciting endangerment of national security, and inciting subversion of state power. They have also advocated undergoing armed training, or even organising armed forces, to resist or oppose the SAR Government, and have even promoted "Hong Kong independence." All of this constitutes conduct in violation of the Hong Kong National Security Law and endangering national security. Our wanted-person operations are entirely based on evidence and prosecutorial policy, from which the conclusion to place them on the wanted list is derived.

These fugitives believe that by "running off" overseas they can escape legal responsibility, and one or two of the wanted persons even rely on holding foreign passports, believing there is nothing we can do about them. I want to tell everyone: the Hong Kong National Security Law has an extraterritorial effect – no matter where you violate the Hong Kong National Security Law, and no matter how long you wait, you remain a wanted person. At this moment, a foreign government may be protecting and shielding you because you are their "running dog" – but once you lose your use value, you will become a discarded pawn; you will remain a wanted person forever, unable to see the light like a rat crossing the street, and you will bring shame upon your family and leave them disgraced.

I would like to further note that I have observed certain countries, such as the UK and the US, smearing our evidence-based wanted-person operations. In fact, these countries themselves have national security legislation of their own – in particular, the United Kingdom has just passed a National Security Act, which is extremely stringent. How can it be that they may have such legislation, yet we may not, according to our own laws and evidence, pursue these criminals? This is precisely double standards. I hope these countries will stop harbouring these fugitives, and will stop interfering with the actions taken by the Hong Kong Special Administrative Region in accordance with the law.

In addition, I wish to further remind everyone that, over the past few days, the Police have arrested a total of four persons – two men and two women – suspected of conducting online crowdfunding to provide monetary assistance to certain fugitives who endanger national security. These wanted persons include "urge others to charge while you slip away yourself" Hui Chi-fung, and "modern-day traitor of the Chinese nation" Nathan Law. The four persons were arrested by the Police for "providing pecuniary assistance for the commission of secession by other persons." I want to remind everyone that funding any person who endangers national security to carry out their conduct may result in criminal liability – do not, under any circumstances, defy the law.

[The Secretary for Security then addressed unrelated matters concerning the forthcoming trial of Jimmy Lai, including court security arrangements (X-ray screening and increased police patrols in response to disruptive "court observers"); the scope of the offence of providing pecuniary assistance to persons endangering national security; and, in response to media questions, the circumstances of Agnes Chow's bail and travel to the Mainland, and the propriety of convicted persons appearing in media programmes. This content is unrelated to the matters in issue in this report and is omitted accordingly.]

Opening Remarks at Press Conference on the Specification of Persons Suspected of Committing Offences Endangering National Security as Absconders, and Related Specified Measures (Chinese Only) (with video)

The Secretary for Security, Mr Chris Tang, held a press conference this morning (December 24) on the specification of persons wanted on suspicion of committing offences endangering national security as absconders and the related specified measures. The Deputy Commissioner of Police (National Security), Mr Kan Kai-yan, and the Chief Superintendent of the National Security Department, Mr Li Kwai-wah, also attended. The following is the opening statement given at the press conference:

Secretary for Security: Fellow Hong Kong citizens, members of the press, good morning to you all. Today the SAR Government is taking further action against persons who have absconded overseas and continue to engage in conduct and activities endangering national security.

First, I announce that I have exercised the powers conferred on me under the Safeguarding National Security Ordinance, and have today published a notice in the Gazette specifying seven persons – previously wanted in July and December 2023, who have absconded overseas and against whom the courts have issued arrest warrants on suspicion of committing offences endangering national security, namely Kwok Fung-yee (Anna Kwok), Yuan Gong-yi (Elmer Yuen), Wing-hang Kwok (Dennis Kwok), Chi-fung Hui (Ted Hui), Kin-fung Yam (Kevin Yam), Hui Wing-ting (Frances Hui), and Joey Siu – as absconders, and have specified the measures to be applied against these seven absconders.

These persons who endanger national security, after absconding overseas, have continued to engage in activities endangering national security, including advocating “Hong Kong independence” through social media platforms and the overthrow of the fundamental system of the People’s Republic of China established under the Constitution of the People’s Republic of China, and inciting secession; launching so-called “referendums” in an attempt to implement so-called “self-determination” and inciting subversion of state power; and publishing so-called reports and meeting with foreign politicians and government officials to request “sanctions,” blockades, and other hostile actions against China and the Hong Kong SAR, including "sanctions" against central and SAR officials and prosecutors.

Furthermore, in relation to one of the absconders specified today, Chi-fung Hui, he conspired with foreign politicians to forge documents in order to deceive the court into permitting him to leave Hong Kong, when in fact he absconded overseas. Following investigation, the Department of Justice considers that there is sufficient evidence to prove that Chi-fung Hui has committed offences endangering national security and has profited therefrom, including receiving and profiting from funds on an online platform suspected of being used to commit offences endangering national security. In this regard, the Department of Justice will, pursuant to paragraph 9 of Schedule 3 to the Implementation Rules for Article 43 of the Law of the People's Republic of China on Safeguarding National Security in the Hong Kong Special Administrative Region, commence legal proceedings to confiscate his criminal proceeds. The Police have today published a notice in the newspapers addressed to Chi-fung Hui concerning the arrest warrant against him, and the Department of Justice will shortly apply to the Court of First Instance for a confiscation order to confiscate Chi-fung Hui's criminal proceeds, in order to prevent him from using such proceeds to continue engaging in conduct and activities endangering national security.

Some of the measures announced today apply to all seven specified absconders, namely:
(1) Prohibition against providing or dealing with funds – that is, no person may provide them with money or other funds, or deal with any money or funds on their behalf;
(2) Prohibition against certain activities relating to immovable property – meaning no person may lease property to them or lease property from them. Where a property transaction is involved, this is equivalent to the first measure just mentioned, namely providing or dealing with funds;
(3) Prohibition relating to joint ventures involving the specified absconders, or the establishment of companies through partnerships or similar arrangements – that is, no person may enter into business partnerships with them, or invest in or provide funds to such enterprises or companies; and
(4) Cancellation of their SAR passports.

Separately, some measures apply only to particular absconders, namely: the temporary suspension of professional qualifications, applicable to the barrister and solicitor qualifications of Kwok Wing-hang and Yam Kin-fung; and the temporary removal from directorships of Yuan Gong-yi's seven companies.

The list of specified absconders and the measures applied against them are set out in detail in today's Gazette Extraordinary notice. The purpose of implementing this series of measures is to address, combat, deter, and prevent absconding conduct, and to deal a heavy strike to these absconders, and to urge absconders to return to Hong Kong to accept law enforcement and judicial proceedings.

I wish to particularly point out that, save with the special authorisation granted by the Secretary for Security, any person who, directly or indirectly, provides any funds to the seven specified absconders – including providing funds to platforms or pages established by them online – or deals with their funds; leases immovable property to, or otherwise makes it available to, the specified absconders, or leases immovable property from them; or establishes joint ventures, partnerships, or similar relationships (including companies) with the specified absconders, or invests in or provides funds to such enterprises or companies, commits an offence and is, upon conviction, liable to imprisonment for seven years. The Police will strictly enforce our law against such criminal conduct, and I appeal to members of the public not to defy the law – members of the public should avoid any monetary or financial dealings with the relevant absconders.

Additionally, the Police National Security Department also announces the offering of a reward for information regarding six persons currently wanted overseas on suspicion of committing offences under the Hong Kong National Security Law. I now invite the National Security Department to introduce the charges and reward details in relation to each individual – first the Deputy Commissioner of Police (National Security), Mr Kan Kai-yan, and subsequently Chief Superintendent Li Kwai-wah, to introduce the charges and reward details for each person.

Deputy Commissioner of Police (National Security): Following the National Security Department's public offer of rewards in 2023 for the arrest of thirteen fugitives who violated the Hong Kong National Security Law, we today announce a further list of persons wanted by the National Security Department.

The wanted list announced by the Police today involves six persons who have absconded overseas. The National Security Department has previously applied to the court, in accordance with the law, for arrest warrants in relation to the offences each of them is suspected of committing under the Hong Kong National Security Law. Although the details of the offences committed by the six fugitives differ, what they have in common is that they have betrayed their country and Hong Kong, disregarded the interests of Hong Kong people, and, having absconded overseas, continue to engage in conduct endangering national security and harming the overall interests of Hong Kong society. The list of persons wanted on suspicion of committing offences under the Hong Kong National Security Law is as follows:

(1) Ka-man (Carmen) Lau, female;
(2) Hon-lam (Tony) Chung, male;
(3) Kim-wah Chung, male;
(4) Leung-mau (Victor) Ho, male;
(5) Joseph Tay, male; and
(6) Hei-ching (Chloe) Cheung, female.

As the law enforcement department responsible for safeguarding national security, the National Security Department has a duty to bring the above persons to justice, and the Police will pursue the above absconders to the end. In addition to issuing arrest warrants and placing them on the wanted list against the persons concerned, the Police will certainly take all measures, including cutting off their sources of funding, to effectively prevent and stop any person from continuing to fund these absconders in engaging in conduct and activities endangering national security.

I must emphasise that endangering national security is a very serious offence, and such conduct or activities may lead to extremely serious consequences. Under Article 37 of the Hong Kong National Security Law, the Law applies to permanent residents of the Hong Kong Special Administrative Region, and to companies and organisations, whether incorporated or unincorporated, established in the SAR, who commit offences under the Law outside the SAR. The Hong Kong Police therefore have a duty to pursue, in accordance with the law, persons suspected of committing offences under the Hong Kong National Security Law outside Hong Kong.

Under Article 33 of the Hong Kong National Security Law, if an offender voluntarily discontinues the commission of the offence; voluntarily surrenders and truthfully confesses their offence; or exposes the offences of others or provides material information leading to the resolution of other criminal cases, a lighter or reduced penalty may be imposed. The Police urge the above wanted persons to turn back before it is too late, cherish this opportunity, return to Hong Kong to surrender, and not compound their mistakes.

We must point out that safeguarding national security is the shared duty of all Hong Kong residents, and it is unlawful for any person, by any means, including through online platforms, to incite, assist, abet, or provide monetary or other financial assistance to another person to commit offences endangering national security.

The Police will continue to relentlessly pursue the identities of contacts, associates, and financiers, whether in Hong Kong or overseas, of all persons suspected of committing offences endangering national security and absconding overseas, and the sources of funds endangering national security, in order to investigate whether further persons have participated in, assisted, abetted, or funded the relevant persons in committing offences endangering national security. The Police will certainly act in strict accordance with our law, pursue all offences without exception, and investigate thoroughly. The Police appeal to members of the public not to defy the law, and will strictly enforce our law against the relevant offenders.

We appeal to any person who holds information regarding the above absconders or any other offence endangering national security to notify the Police as soon as possible; members of the public may report such information through the National Security Department's reporting hotline.

I will now hand over to Chief Superintendent Li Kwai-wah to introduce, one by one, the suspected offences and basic facts of the case in relation to the six wanted persons.

Chief Superintendent, Police National Security Department: Thank you. The backgrounds of these six persons are similar – they have absconded from Hong Kong, yet continue brazenly to establish or join organisations to carry out conduct endangering national security. Their alleged offences include "incitement to secession" under Article 21, "subversion of state power" under Article 22, and "collusion with a foreign country or with external elements to endanger national security" under Article 29 of the Hong Kong National Security Law.

I will introduce the facts and charges relating to each person in turn.

The first is Ka-man (Carmen) Lau, a 29-year-old woman, suspected of committing "incitement to secession" under Article 21 and "collusion with a foreign country or with external elements to endanger national security" under Article 29 of the Hong Kong National Security Law. During the period from October 2021 to May 2024, it is alleged that, in her capacity as a key member of the Hong Kong Democracy Council, she published articles and speeches, and posted content and videos on social media, advocating the separation of the Hong Kong SAR from the People's Republic of China. She also begged foreign officials, legislators, and politicians to impose "sanctions," blockades, and other hostile actions against the People's Republic of China and the Hong Kong SAR, including demanding "sanctions" against SAR government officials involved in implementing the Safeguarding National Security Ordinance, and the abolition of the privileges of Hong Kong's economic and trade offices in other jurisdictions.

The second is Hon-lam (Tony) Chung, a 23-year-old man, suspected of committing "incitement to secession" under Article 21 and "collusion with a foreign country or with external elements to endanger national security" under Article 29, during the period from December 2023 to May 2024. This individual was previously sentenced in November 2021 to 43 months' imprisonment for secession and money laundering offences. After completing his sentence and being released in June 2023, he was, under the law, required to comply with a one-year supervision order from the Correctional Services Department; however, in the same month, he deceived Correctional Services staff by claiming he was travelling overseas, and never returned to Hong Kong, and was accordingly wanted by the Correctional Services Department for breach of the supervision order. This individual has, while overseas, continuously advocated Hong Kong independence-related conduct through various platforms and means, including establishing the "Hong Kong Independence Advocacy Committee," attending events to give speeches, giving interviews, and posting content, and has also begged foreign countries to impose "sanctions," blockades, and hostile actions against the People's Republic of China and the Hong Kong SAR Government.

The third person is Kim-wah Chung, aged 64, suspected of committing "incitement to secession" under Article 21 and "collusion with a foreign country or with external elements to endanger national security" under Article 29. It is alleged that, during the period from May to June 2024, this individual advocated "Hong Kong independence" through various platforms. He also, during the period from December 2020 to November 2023, begged foreign countries to impose "sanctions," blockades, and hostile actions against the People's Republic of China and the Hong Kong SAR, including jointly requesting foreign countries to sanction judges handling cases under the Hong Kong National Security Law and the prosecutors responsible for such cases, as well as demanding the abolition of the privileges of Hong Kong's economic and trade offices.

The next person is Leung-mau (Victor) Ho, aged 69, suspected of committing "subversion of state power" under Article 22 of the Hong Kong National Security Law. It is alleged that, since July 2024, this individual, through various platforms and means, including jointly organising with other persons a so-called "Hong Kong Parliament Electoral Organizing Committee," sought through an election to conduct a so-called "referendum" and so-called Hong Kong "self-determination" and "self-governance," with the aim of overthrowing the organs of political power of the Hong Kong SAR.

The next is Joseph Tay, aged 62, suspected of committing "incitement to secession" under Article 21 and "collusion with a foreign country or with external elements to endanger national security" under Article 29 of the Hong Kong National Security Law. It is alleged that, during the period from July 2020 to June 2024, this individual operated a channel named "HongKonger Station" on a social media platform, and posted numerous videos inciting secession on that channel, as well as posting content, speeches, and videos on a media platform to promote "Hong Kong independence" conduct. During this period, he also repeatedly, through various platforms or means, begged foreign countries to impose sanctions against central and SAR officials, including requesting that foreign countries invoke the Magnitsky Act to sanction officials associated with the Hong Kong National Security Law.

The last is Hei-ching (Chloe) Cheung, a 19-year-old female, suspected of committing "incitement to secession" under Article 21 and "collusion with a foreign country or with external elements to endanger national security" under Article 29 of the Hong Kong National Security Law. It is alleged that, during the period from August 2022 to November 2024, in her capacity as a key member of the "Committee for Freedom in Hong Kong (CFHK) Foundation," she published articles and speeches, and posted content and videos on social media, advocating Hong Kong independence. During this period, she also begged foreign officials, legislators, and politicians to impose "sanctions," blockades, and hostile actions against the People's Republic of China and the Hong Kong SAR, including sanctions against certain central and SAR officials, and maliciously demanding an increase in the business risk of operating in Hong Kong.

As you have all heard, given the seriousness of the above facts, the Police attach great importance to this case. We are now offering a reward of HK$1 million in respect of each wanted person, and call on members of the public to provide information concerning the relevant persons and the case.

I will now hand it back to the Secretary for concluding remarks.

Secretary for Security: Finally, I wish to conclude by letting society know of the necessity and determination of the Government to combat, in accordance with the law, absconders who endanger national security. The targets of this action include persons who have been wanted for a longer period, who have continuously absconded overseas, who remain unrepentant in continuing to endanger our national security through various means, and who wantonly collude with external forces to shield their wrongdoing.

I also wish to take this opportunity to state emphatically that no person who endangers national security should believe that, by being overseas, they can evade criminal responsibility and escape justice. The SAR Government will use every means available, in accordance with the law, to pursue and combat criminals who have absconded overseas and endanger national security, and will spare no effort to achieve “Violations of the law will always be pursued and punished – however far, they will certainly be struck down.”

Finally, I appeal to members of the public not to defy the law; members of the public should avoid any monetary or financial dealings with specified absconders, so as to avoid contravening the relevant legislation.

Translation of the Material:
The following is the content of remarks made by the Secretary for Security, Mr Chris Tang, to the media at Tamar Central Government Offices today (July 31) after attending a meeting of the Fight Crime Committee:

Fellow Hong Kong citizens, members of the press, good day to you all.

Today, I will talk to you about the overall law and order situation in Hong Kong in the first half of this year, from January to June.

[The Secretary for Security then gave a detailed briefing on crime statistics for the first half of 2025, including an overall 4.2% year-on-year decrease in crime (43,407 cases), a decline in traditional offences such as robbery, burglary, and assault, an increase in serious drug offences and fraud cases, trends in online scams (particularly “task scams” and fake job scams), cross-border anti-fraud cooperation through the “FRONTIER+” platform, and the bank-sector "Scam Alert" scheme. He further discussed the rise in reported etomidate (“space oil”) drug use, particularly among persons under 21, its serious physical and psychological effects, the Government's decision to rename the drug “etomidate” rather than using street names, and upcoming anti-drug publicity initiatives, including a 24-hour reporting hotline and school drug testing.]

Reporter: First, regarding the 2012 taxi driver chokehold case, in which the inquest returned a verdict of unlawful killing, will the Police reopen the investigation? Is the officer involved still serving in the Police Force at present? Will he be suspended from duty? Also, I would like to ask – the UK Government has indicated it is considering resuming extradition arrangements with Hong Kong; is there a possibility that some national security fugitives could be extradited back to Hong Kong? Some UK Members of Parliament have expressed concern that people may be extradited for political reasons – what is your view on this?

Secretary for Security: Regarding the verdict in the case you have just mentioned, we have taken note of it. We are currently studying the judgment, and will decide on the next steps thereafter. The officer concerned remains a member of the Police Force. In light of the recommendations previously given by the Coroner's Court, we have already strengthened training for our officers in this regard.

As for your second question, concerning national security fugitives – some of these fugitives who have violated national security laws are currently wanted, and some have been specified as absconders. I want to say: if you have been specified as an absconder for violating the Hong Kong National Security Law, it is unlawful for any person to provide you with funds or to assist in handling your funds. Your professional qualifications will be revoked, and your SAR passport will also be temporarily cancelled. You may currently believe yourself safe while overseas, but we will use every means available to bring you back to Hong Kong to stand trial. At this moment, someone may be protecting you because you still have use value. Once you no longer have any use value, you will become a discarded pawn, or even a political bargaining chip.

[The reporter asked about the reasons for officially naming the drug “etomidate” rather than alternative names such as “zombie oil,” and about the feasibility of installing cameras in police vehicles as recommended by the 2012 inquest jury. The Secretary for Security's response addressed only these unrelated matters – the drug-naming rationale and the practical difficulties of in-vehicle recording given the presence of victims and witnesses – and did not touch upon matters relevant to this report.]

Reporter: I would like to ask about the "Lung Fung" incident – yesterday, police officers entered "Lung Fung" on Canton Road with a search warrant bearing an incorrect address, sealed off the shop during the investigation, and did not apologise after discovering the error – what is your response to this? Also, regarding the “Hong Kong Parliament” case involving 19 persons – has any investigation been conducted into whether these 19 persons have remained in contact with their families? Are all of the others currently overseas? What is known of their whereabouts? Thank you.

Secretary for Security: First, turning to events over the past few days – the Police took large-scale action against a triad syndicate involved in a money-laundering case exceeding HK$40 billion. During the operation, more than 80 persons were arrested and dozens of addresses were searched. We are grateful to members of the public for their cooperation and understanding during this process.

Separately, as for the fugitives you mentioned in relation to national security offences – any person specified as an absconder, if you provide funds to them or handle their funds, this is unlawful, and we will certainly conduct thorough investigations, whether in Hong Kong or elsewhere. Any person who breaks the law will be pursued to the full extent in accordance with our law.

[The reporter asked for the Secretary for Security's personal views on the taxi driver chokehold case verdict, and whether the decline in overall crime alongside a reported rise in illegal immigration from the Mainland was related to the Top Talent Pass Scheme. The Secretary for Security's response addressed only these unrelated matters and did not touch upon matters relevant to this report.]

Because after 2019, due to political manipulation by some countries, even some arrangements that they had originally been willing to pursue for us were temporarily suspended.

In fact, the only people who benefit from this are criminals.

This is similar to those people who broke the law in Hong Kong, fled, and sought protection from foreign countries.

For the time being, this benefits these people, but I believe justice certainly exists.

Very soon, once they lose that protective umbrella, these people will have to face the crimes they committed in Hong Kong.

Those who have broken the law will carry that charge for life, and will be wanted by us for life.

We will certainly use every possible means to arrest you.

As I said, at this moment you may have some protective umbrella shielding you, but the world is fair. If you have broken the law, there is always a chance that we will bring you back and arrest you.

We will do everything within our power to arrest you, to demonstrate Hong Kong's justice and rule of law.

Of course, if the person is temporarily not in Hong Kong, and is in a place where the law may not allow us to extradite them back immediately, there may be some difficulties in the short term, but that does not mean we will stop.

We will certainly use any method in the hope of bringing them to justice.

At the time, we were trying to plug a legal loophole, through the Fugitive Offenders Ordinance, and that loophole still remains.

But I think, after what society went through in 2019, it may need time to digest this.

We will see when the appropriate time comes to study again how this matter should be handled.

咁嘅因為呢就喺2019年之後呢有啲國家呢因為呢個嘅政治嘅操弄啦
啫就算原本有啲呢我哋啲願意嘅都暫時停止咗
咁呢個呢其實係呃唯一得益嘅就係犯罪嘅人
就類似呢班呢啲係呀喺香港犯咗法走咗佬要求外國有保護傘嘅
就係呢係呃對呢啲人呢暫時有利 但我相信呢公義一定係存在嘅
呀好快呢佢冇咗保護傘呢啲人呢就要面對返喺香港所犯嘅罪行
咁樣犯咗法嘅人呢你一世呢都揹住個罪名 一世呢 畀我哋通緝嘅
我哋一定會盡一切嘅辦法呢去將你拘捕嘅
正如我所講呢一刻呢你可能哎有啲保護傘呢保護緊你
但係呢個世界呢係好公道（喺）你犯咗法呢
你就一定係有機會呢係畀我哋拉返
我哋呢會盡一切嘅能力呢去將你拘捕

彰顯我哋香港嘅公義同埋法治

當然啦如果佢人呢就係暫時唔喺香港呢

而喺嗰啲地方呢可能喺果個係即係法例上未必容許我哋即時係呃將佢係引渡返嚟咁喺短時間內可能有啲困難嘅 但呢個唔代表我哋會停止

我哋一定會用任何嘅方式呢希望將佢可以正法

但因為當日呢就係即我哋係想嘗試去堵塞個法律漏洞啦

利用呢個呃逃犯條例 咁嗰個漏洞都仲仍仍然係存在嘅

咁但我諗呢整個社會經歷咗2019年呢可能都要時間呢去呃消化一下

睇下緊幾時先再喺一個適當嘅時間再研究呢樣嘢係點樣處理

Translation of the Article:

Hong Kong police on Monday publicly issued wanted notices for eight Hong Kong individuals currently overseas, namely Yam Kin-fung (Kevin Yam), Yuan Gong-yi (Elmer Yuen), Kwok Fung-yee (Anna Kwok), Kwok Wing-hang (Dennis Kwok), Hui Chi-fung (Ted Hui), Mung Siu-tat (Christopher Mung), Lau Cho-dik (Finn Lau), and Law Kwun-chung (Nathan Law), each with a bounty of HK$1 million.

Chief Executive John Lee stated yesterday that he fully supports and agrees with the police action. He called on members of the public–including relatives and friends of the wanted individuals–to provide information. He stressed that no matter where the fugitives go, the police will pursue them for life and hold them legally accountable.

Secretary for Security Chris Tang, meanwhile, singled out Nathan Law for criticism, calling him a "modern-day traitor of the Chinese nation" and a "tortoise hiding in its shell" who is "profiting from others' suffering," accusing him of enjoying a life of prosperity abroad. He urged Law to surrender and said that law enforcement agencies would devote their lifetime efforts to apprehending him.

John Lee stated before the Executive Council meeting yesterday that he fully supports and agrees with the police operation. He emphasized that endangering national security is a serious offence and that the SAR government will strictly enforce our law. Any member of the public assisting the police in tracking down fugitives will have their identity kept confidential.

He added that relatives and friends of the wanted individuals who provide information relating to the fugitives or the cases may receive the full reward or a proportional share, depending on the results achieved.

Lee also said that all lawful means will be used, and every effort will be made to pursue the fugitives for life and hold them legally accountable. He reiterated that offering rewards for wanted fugitives is not unprecedented, and stressed that the only way for those wanted to end their status is to surrender. Doing so may allow the court to consider a reduced sentence; otherwise, they will remain wanted for life, living in constant fear of arrest.

He stressed that the SAR government will spare no effort in pursuing offenders who endanger national security, will actively seek assistance from the public, and will also investigate the forces behind these individuals.

Tang criticises Nathan Law as "modern-day traitor of the Chinese nation" and "tortoise hiding in its shell"

However, Nathan Law and several other wanted individuals have stated that they will refuse to return to Hong Kong to surrender. Chris Tang yesterday explicitly condemned Nathan Law as a "modern-day traitor of the Chinese nation," also describing him as a "tortoise hiding in its shell" who "profits from others' suffering."

He criticised Law for enjoying a life of wealth and comfort abroad while the young people he allegedly incited must face legal consequences. Tang expressed hope that Law would regain his courage and conscience and return to Hong Kong to surrender. He added that law enforcement agencies would devote their lifetime efforts to capturing him.

Authorities also stated that through the issuance of the wanted notices, they hope to obtain information on the fugitives and identify the financial backers behind them.

Following the announcement, the United States, the United Kingdom, and Australia condemned or expressed concern over the move, criticizing it as suppressing freedoms in Hong Kong.

In response, a spokesperson for the Office of the Commissioner of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Hong Kong issued a statement expressing strong dissatisfaction and firm opposition to what it described as "fallacies" about Hong Kong. The spokesperson criticised foreign parties for commenting on the lawful actions of Hong Kong police, smearing the National Security Law, and interfering with the rule of law and normal law enforcement in the SAR.

Foreign Ministry office: Hong Kong police actions comply with international law and practice

The spokesperson stated that the principal anti-China, Hong Kong-destabilising culprits who fled abroad, including Yam Kin-fung, have long engaged in anti-China and destabilizing activities in Hong Kong, selling out Hong Kong for personal glory, inciting and even attempting to use force to split the country and subvert state power, and colluding with external forces for personal political gain.

The spokesperson said that the Hong Kong police, acting based on facts and in accordance with the law, have legitimately exercised jurisdiction over major fugitives overseas under protective jurisdiction principles, in line with international law and international practice.

The statement reiterated that safeguarding national sovereignty, security, and development interests is the highest principle of the “One Country, Two Systems” policy. Defending national security is both justified and necessary, and no external forces will be allowed to interfere.

The Security Bureau also issued a statement strongly opposing and condemning what it described as groundless criticism from certain countries. It stated that the actions of the National Security Department are reasonable, justified, and lawful, and that endangering national security is a serious crime. No country, it said, would stand by in the face of such acts.

The bureau added that publicly releasing information on fugitives suspected of serious crimes and seeking public assistance to bring them to justice is common practice for Hong Kong police and other law enforcement agencies, and is consistent with international norms.

The spokesperson further stated that no country should harbour criminals. It noted that wanted individuals who flee overseas often continue to engage in activities endangering national security, which it described as outrageous. It criticised certain countries for attempting to justify such individuals under various pretexts, calling such actions disrespectful to the rule of law and morally reprehensible.

The Hong Kong government stated that it will seize every opportunity to bring fugitives to justice in accordance with the law and will not allow them to evade accountability.

[i-Cable News] The Police National Security Department has issued arrest warrants and placed bounties on eight Hong Kong individuals currently overseas, suspected of colluding with foreign forces and inciting subversion of state power. Chief Executive John Lee stated that he fully supports and agrees with the police issuing the warrants, adding that the authorities will pursue them “to the ends of the earth” and bring them to justice.

The National Security Department issued arrest warrants and offered rewards for these eight overseas individuals, including former Legislative Council members Dennis Kwok, Ted Hui, and Nathan Law, former General Secretary of the Confederation of Trade Unions Christopher Mung, and “Hong Kong Parliament” founder Elmer Yuen, among others.

Chief Executive John Lee stated that he fully supports and agrees with the police operation, repeatedly emphasising that they will be pursued “for life”.

John Lee said:

“The government will use all lawful means and make every effort to pursue offenders endangering national security to the very end. We will pursue their legal responsibility for life. No matter where they go, even to the ends of the earth, we will pursue these offenders for life. For a wanted person to end their wanted status, there is only one way: surrender. By surrendering, they may receive consideration for a reduced sentence under the Hong Kong National Security Law. Otherwise, they will be wanted for life, living each day in fear of arrest and in constant anxiety.”

Among the eight wanted individuals, Nathan Law has already stated that he will not surrender. Anna Kwok questioned the Hong Kong government’s authority to arrest individuals overseas, while several others stated they would not cease their advocacy work abroad. John Lee responded that authorities would also investigate the forces behind them.

John Lee said:

“Since they have committed acts endangering national security, we will investigate what forces and powers are behind them. Those backing forces may not stop, but we are telling them that our efforts to pursue and combat them will also not stop. We have different forms of police cooperation with different jurisdictions. As we pursue these suspects for life, we believe there will be opportunities to ensure they cannot evade justice.”

In this operation, the National Security Department offered a reward of HKD 1 million for each of the eight individuals. John Lee stated that rewards are often offered in serious cases, and specifically noted that even relatives and friends of the wanted persons would be eligible for rewards if they provide useful information. The police will keep the identity of informants confidential.

Translation of the Material:

The following is the content of remarks made by the Secretary for Security, Mr Chris Tang, to the media this morning (June 12) regarding the specification of absconders who have committed offences endangering national security under the Safeguarding National Security Ordinance, and the measures specified against them:

Secretary for Security: Fellow Hong Kong citizens, members of the press. Today, in my capacity as Secretary for Security, exercising the powers conferred upon me under sections 89(1) and 89(4) of the Safeguarding National Security Ordinance, I have today published a notice in the Gazette specifying six absconders – who have fled to the United Kingdom and against whom arrest warrants have been issued by the Hong Kong courts for offences relating to national security – as specified absconders under the law, and have accordingly imposed specified measures against these specified absconders under the law.

These six wanted persons are now specified as absconders, namely: Law Kwun-chung (Nathan Law), Mung Siu-tat (Christopher Mung), Lau Cho-dik (Finn Lau), Cheng Man-kit (Simon Cheng), Fok Ka-chi, and Choi Ming-da. The relevant measures include the following:

First, a prohibition on providing or dealing with funds – that is, no person may provide them with money or other funds, or deal with any money or funds on their behalf;

Second, a prohibition on certain activities relating to immovable property – meaning no person may lease property to them or lease property from them. Where a property transaction is involved, this would be equivalent to the first measure I mentioned, namely providing or dealing with funds;

Third, a prohibition relating to joint ventures or partnerships involving the specified absconders – that is, no person may enter into a business partnership with them;

Fourth, cancellation of their SAR passports;

Fifth, temporary suspension of their professional qualifications; and Sixth, temporary removal from their positions as company directors.

In order not to affect innocent third parties, tenancy agreements signed before I specified these persons as absconders, or partnership agreements entered into before the specification, will not be affected. The specific measures applicable to each individual have been set out in detail in today's Gazette notice.

I wish to emphasise a few points here. First, I have already requested the relevant departments and agencies to implement the above measures in accordance with the law. Second, all six specified absconders are hiding in the United Kingdom. Since the SAR implemented the Hong Kong National Security Law and enacted the Safeguarding National Security Ordinance, UK officials, politicians, certain organisations, and certain media outlets have used distorted accounts of the facts to smear the SAR Government, with the aim of undermining our rule of law.

Furthermore, the persons I have just referred to have also attempted to influence the outcome of certain national-security-related cases in Hong Kong. In addition, the Chinese Embassy in the United Kingdom has previously pointed out that the UK Government fabricated a case in order to prosecute, under the pretext of violating the UK's National Security Act, a staff member of the Hong Kong Economic and Trade Office in London. These six specified absconders have been harboured in the United Kingdom, and continue to collude with external forces to engage in activities endangering the security of Hong Kong and the nation, including continuing to advocate secession, continuing to advocate the subversion of the Central Government, and continuing to carry out incitement – for these reasons, we consider it necessary to take this action of specifying them as absconders. These measures are intended to address, combat, deter, and prevent such absconding conduct, and are intended to encourage the specified absconders to find the courage to return to Hong Kong and face and accept legal and judicial proceedings.

Third, I wish to emphasise that, save with the special authorisation granted by the Secretary for Security, any person who contravenes the measures I have just described may, upon conviction, be sentenced to a maximum of seven years' imprisonment, and the Police will strictly enforce our law.

Fourth, I wish to say that, as for the other absconding wanted persons, we will review the situation from time to time and, where necessary, will specify them as absconders under the law and impose the relevant measures against them, to combat their absconding conduct.

Finally, I appeal to members of the public to avoid any monetary or financial dealings with these absconders, and to avoid any collusion with these criminals who endanger national security – everyone must, under no circumstances, defy the law. Thank you all.

Reporter: First, why were only these six persons selected for restrictions, rather than other absconders? Some of them have already indicated that they will renounce their passports, or will not return to Hong Kong at all – how effective will restrictions preventing them from purchasing property, serving as directors, or having their passports cancelled actually be? Second, many people subscribe to their Patreon or YouTube channels and similar platforms – is this conduct unlawful? Will the authorities require these platforms to submit information to assist Police enforcement? Finally, regarding the "Siu Tung Kwan Chau Wui" case, has an action restriction order been issued against those currently on bail? Does this include a ban on entering or leaving Victoria Park? Thank you.

Secretary for Security: First, in relation to persons against whom arrest warrants have been issued by the courts for violating the Safeguarding National Security Ordinance or committing national-security-related offences, we may specify them as absconders under the Safeguarding National Security Ordinance; as to the timing of such action, or against whom action is taken first, we will review this from time to time and weigh different considerations. In this instance, in relation to these six specified absconders who have fled to the United Kingdom, the reason, as I have just explained, is that we have noted that the UK Government, many politicians, organisations, and media outlets have deliberately smeared our Government, and have attempted to influence the trial of national-security-related cases currently proceeding in Hong Kong, while these six absconders have been harboured in the United Kingdom, continuing to engage in activities endangering national security. We therefore consider this an appropriate time to specify these six persons as absconders and to impose the relevant measures. Second, any person who, by any means and on any platform, provides funds to these persons or deals with their funds, is in violation of this requirement. Additionally, regarding the "Siu Tung Kwan Chau Wui" case you mentioned, we have, under the Safeguarding National Security Ordinance, issued specified action orders in relation to certain actions on that occasion.

Reporter: For persons without a valid passport who wish to return to Hong Kong, what avenues are available to them? Also, as mentioned earlier, regarding persons subscribing to their YouTube or Patreon channels, how will the Government monitor their subscription activity?

Secretary for Security: First, I wish to reiterate that any person who, by any platform, provides funds to these specified absconders or deals with their funds, is in violation of these measures, and may be sentenced to a maximum of seven years' imprisonment upon conviction. The Police will act on such violations based on the evidence. As for those persons whose passports have been temporarily cancelled, if they wish to return to Hong Kong to surrender, we very much welcome this. They need only contact the Immigration Department, and we will issue a temporary travel document to allow them to return to Hong Kong to surrender.

If any person violates the measures by providing funds to them or dealing with their funds, the Police will take further enforcement action based on the evidence.

Reporter: There are currently thirteen overseas Hong Kong residents wanted for violating national security, with the first batch of six now subject to restrictions. You mentioned earlier that this will be reviewed from time to time – could you give a timetable or specific schedule, for example, a review every three months or six months? Also, you mentioned earlier that funds may only be provided to them with the special authorisation of the Secretary for Security – could you explain under what circumstances such authorisation would be granted?

Secretary for Security: We will review the situation from time to time, on an ongoing basis, without a fixed schedule of once a month or every two months; where necessary, we will review the situation and specify other absconders who have fled overseas under the law. As for the special authorisation, this would only be considered where it is reasonable, lawful, and does not affect national security. For example, a person may be involved with a company that needs to make Mandatory Provident Fund (MPF) contributions – we would consider whether this would endanger national security, and whether it is necessary, before considering whether to grant a special authorisation.

On 25 July, the Police National Security Department placed 19 persons on the wanted list, with rewards offered, in respect of the organising, establishment of, or participation in the "Hong Kong Parliament" outside Hong Kong, including Chin Po-fun, on suspicion of committing the offence of "subversion of state power" under the Hong Kong National Security Law. It is understood from sources that, this morning (the 19th), officers of the National Security Department took Chin Po-fun's sister to Tuen Mun Police Station to assist with enquiries, and that she left the police station at around 12:30pm.

The Police earlier stated that 19 persons involved in the organising, establishment of, or participation in the "Hong Kong Parliament" outside Hong Kong were suspected of committing the offence of "subversion of state power" under the Hong Kong National Security Law, including Yuan Gong-yi, Ho Leung-mau, Fok Ka-chi and Choi Ming-da, who had previously been placed on the wanted list with a reward of HK$1 million; five persons alleged to have participated in the "Hong Kong Parliament Electoral Organizing Committee"; and ten "members of the Hong Kong Parliament", including Chin Po-fun, Keung Ka-wai and Zhang Xinyan. The court has, upon application by the Police, issued arrest warrants.

The Secretary for Security, Chris Tang Ping-keung, also exercised on 4 August the powers conferred by the Safeguarding National Security Ordinance to publish a notice in the Gazette specifying 16 persons who are subject to arrest warrants and are absconding, including Ho Leung-mau and Fok Ka-chi, and imposing a number of measures, comprising "Prohibition against making available funds etc. or dealing with funds etc.", "Prohibition against certain activities in connection with immovable property", and "Prohibition in connection with joint ventures or partnerships with relevant absconders", among others. Most of those persons are subject to "Cancellation of HKSAR passports etc."; and, in the case of individual persons, "Temporary removal from office of director" also applies.

(Central News Agency, Taipei)

Staff members of the Hong Kong Economic and Trade Office (ETO) in London have been charged under the United Kingdom's National Security legislation for allegedly assisting a foreign intelligence service, among other offences. Regina Ip Lau Suk-yee, Convenor of the Hong Kong Executive Council, stated that the nature of the Hong Kong ETO in London has changed and that it is necessary to monitor the activities of exiled Hong Kong individuals in the United Kingdom. She further asserted that foreign consulates in Hong Kong engage in similar practices.

UK authorities recently charged three men under national security laws, including Yuen Chung-biu (Bill Yuen), an administrative manager at the Hong Kong ETO in London. The three are accused of assisting a foreign intelligence service in gathering intelligence and conducting surveillance, targeting individuals including Nathan Law and others subject to bounty warrants issued by the Hong Kong government. They are also alleged to have been involved in foreign interference, including forcibly entering a residential property in the United Kingdom.

Hong Kong broadcaster Now News aired an interview with Regina Ip yesterday, in which she stated that the Hong Kong ETO in London had previously focused primarily on lobbying Members of Parliament, but that its nature has now changed.

Ip stated that certain “anti-China” legislators, as well as Hong Kong exiles in the United Kingdom, have from time to time introduced motions targeting Hong Kong, including calls for sanctions. She said that the ETO needs to monitor such developments, explaining that “so-called intelligence gathering refers to observing these developments.”

She further stated that foreign consulates in Hong Kong also conduct intelligence gathering activities, including through publicly available information, television programmes, media reports, and online sources. She questioned, “If our personnel at the ETO are carrying out similar information-gathering work, why would that be illegal? I truly do not understand.”

Ip added that if UK–China relations were to return to normal, the nature of the ETO's work would also change, and she believes that there would be greater opportunities for different forms of exchange.
